

Story of Bruno Richard Hauptmann in Pictures

The Lindbergh house in the Sourland hills' region of New Jersey, from which the child was kidnaped.

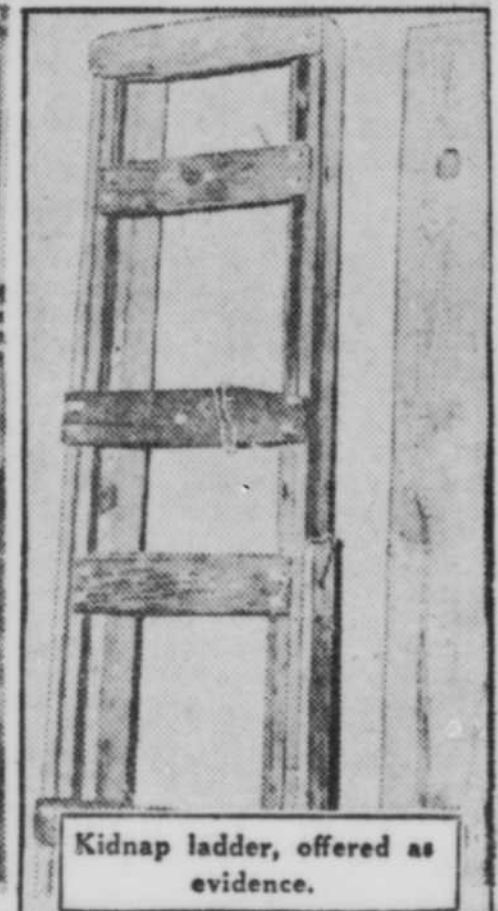

Original ransom note, pinned to window sill of nursery of Lindbergh home, giving directions as to denomination of bills.

Baby Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., kidnaped the night of March 1, 1932, from the Lindbergh home near Hopewell, N. J.

Crib from which Baby Lindbergh was kidnaped.

Kidnap ladder, offered as evidence.

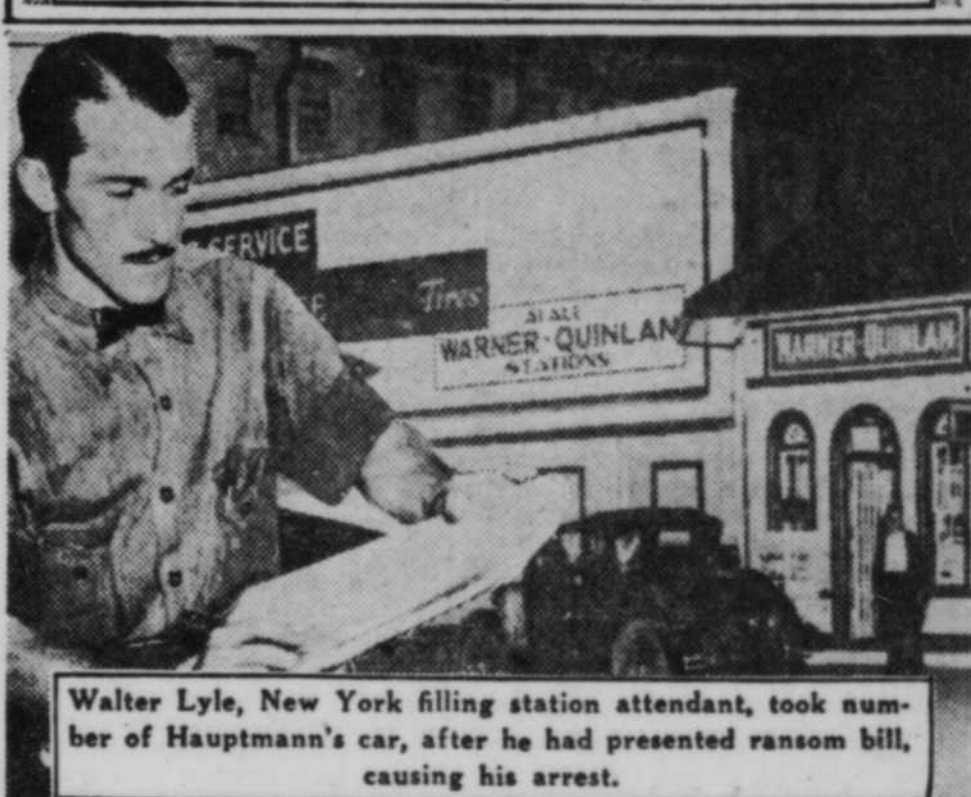

Bruno Richard Hauptmann

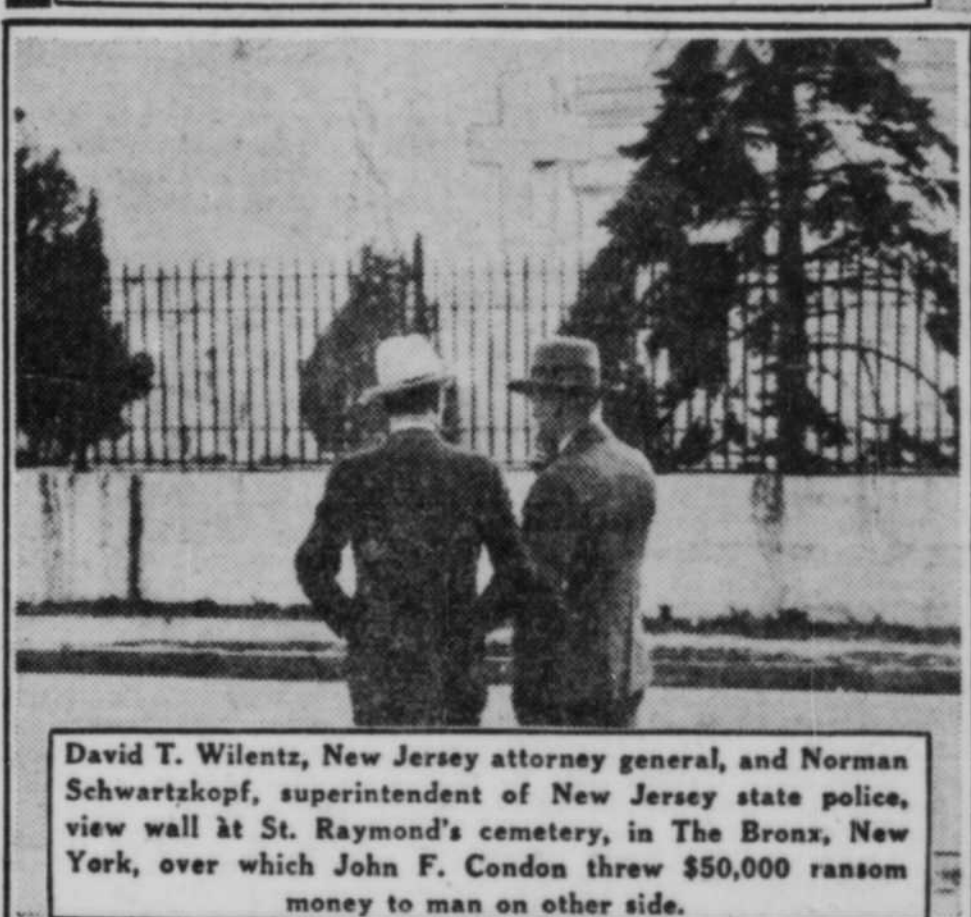

In his cell at Flemington, after hearing death sentence—the last posed photograph permitted. A few minutes later Hauptmann was taken to death house of New Jersey state penitentiary at Trenton.

Orville Wilson and William Allen point to the spot where they found the decomposed body of child.

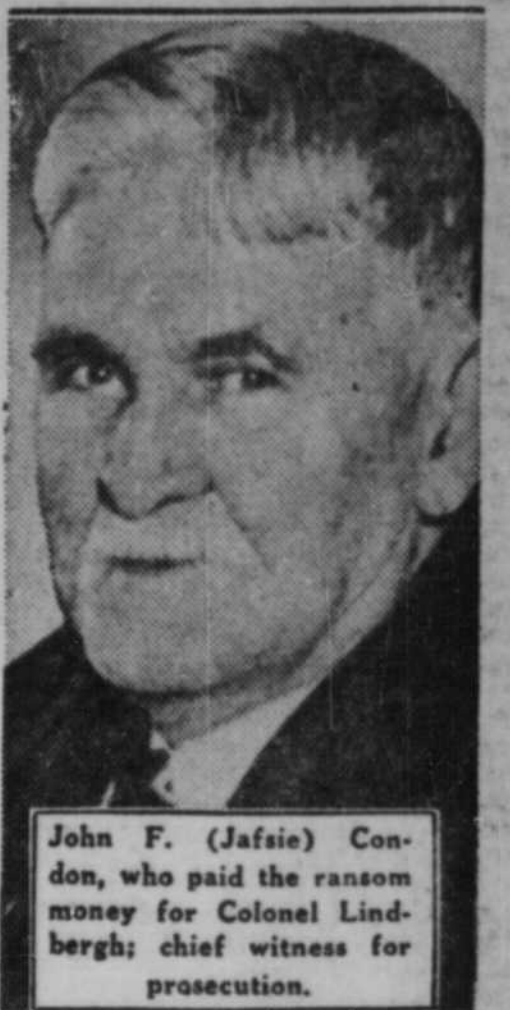

Walter Lyle, New York filling station attendant, took number of Hauptmann's car, after he had presented ransom bill, causing his arrest.

David T. Wilentz, New Jersey attorney general, and Norman Schwartzkopf, superintendent of New Jersey state police, view wall at St. Raymond's cemetery, in The Bronx, New York, over which John F. Condon threw $50,000 ransom money to man on other side.

Evidence at trial—showing how money and gun were hidden.

John F. (Jassie) Condon, who paid the ransom money for Colonel Lindbergh; chief witness for prosecution.

Mrs. Bruno Hauptmann and Mannfried.

Miss Betty Gow, Lindbergh baby's nurse, witness at trial.

Justice Thomas W. Trenchard, who presided at Hauptmann trial.

Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh entering courthouse.

Central Press Association, 1936.

The jury that found Hauptmann guilty.

Hauptmann consulting with counsel at trial—Edward J. Reilly, left, and C. Lloyd Fisher, who later became chief counsel, right.

Mrs. Anne Lindbergh, escorted by Robert Peacock, assistant attorney general, appears as a witness at trial.

Gov. Harold G. Hoffman of New Jersey, who demanded new evidence.

Attorney General David T. Wilentz, prosecutor.